Paris, France, the 'City of Love' where Pois Pierre a wealthy bachelor appears to have it all; he's well dressed, debonair and French. He lives in a glorious penthouse on Rue de La Moola, the most expensive boulevard in the world, yet he's sick of being single and longs for a mate.

The problem is; He has no idea how to date! Although quite debonair, he's insecure about his looks, especially the fact that his head looks like bread or brioche as they say.

He's not alone however, as his good friends are also miserable and lonely bachelors. When they finally meet the woman of their dreams, they all snooze and loose; until old Monsieur Codger steps up as The Godfather of Love with some help from a muse and a little dove. With lines that rhyme, the story's narrative has poetic undertone but not overdone; its fun and lightly baked like a good brioche. Paired with clever wit, fine dining and cuisine, the story tickles the funny bone and whets the appetite for love. ~
